

All that is new is for sharing

Jamespot allows you to create your own customizable pages - the spots – so that you can bring together and present - spot-it - your favorite web sites and share your interests with your friends.

A new concept that encourages the spontaneous sharing of Web

Spotting allows for the spontaneous spreading of exciting, ever-changing information on a daily basis, from spot to spot. The old ways of sharing information are still with us: printing, highlighting some text before passing it on by faxing or scanning it – but these documents may be found at the bottom of a filing cabinet. Digital methods have also proved their worth: bookmarking a web page in your Favorites, send the link by email, posting the information on your own web site or write blog for your network of friends. But if you want to use any of these tools to really communicate and share your interests, you will find your bright ideas quickly going stale. These everyday methods are a little complicated, but you can revolutionize them with Jamespot.

Who are these new spotters? Jamespot is for everyone who already has a business, friends or a group network or for those who belong to a community, a class, a team, a club or a university ...and who want to easily share Web content about common interests, whether they are transient or long-term.

You can be curious and generous with your new discoveries without wasting time.

Spotting-it, as simple as can be.

How does it work? You create spots about the things you are interested in. These spots are fed as you find new content on the Web. By using a simple Jamespot button on the browser, you can directly “spot” a text, an image, a video...from the original site to your spot. You can add a comment to highlight your finding. Immediately, followers of your spot are informed by email of any updates, and the next debate is up and running! Of course, everybody will be able to enrich your spot with other articles found on the Web, according to the rules set by you, the spot’s creator. Your spots will also grow through working with James, the news search engine that is always suggesting interesting and relevant articles.

Why did we create Jamespot ? Because we don’t want to write anymore, but we still want to select content from the Web. Jamespot is a balance between your need to produce stimulating content and your lack of time. Jamespot is a durable communication tool, that everyone can use, where your information becomes unique and different in one click. So, the spots take on a whole new dimension, both for the spotters and the people that read the spots.

Enjoy sharing how you see the world.

The Jamespot story. Jamespot.com was launched in January 2006 and based on a highperformance, innovative RSS search engine. Thanks to our many subscribers and our traffic across all continents, we are able to enrich our services and create new initiatives for